Before air-conditioners (空调) were invented, southern China's skywells played a key role in keeping people's (people) homes cool. Could they do it again today?

A skywell, or tian jing, is a typical part of traditional homes in southern and eastern China. Different from a northern Chinese courtyard, or yuan zi, it is smarter (smart) and less open to the outdoor environment.

Skywells were designed (design) to cool buildings before air-conditioners appeared. When wind blows above a skywell house, it can enter the indoor space ___4___ when the opening. Because outdoor air is often cooler than indoor air, the wind blows in and moves down the walls to the lower floors and creates (create) airflow by taking the place of warmer indoor air, which rises and leaves.

Skywell buildings have a history of hundreds of years in China, though recently they have often been forgotten by people who prefer modern buildings. Over the past twenty years, however, skywell buildings ___7___ has started (start) to become popular again.

Yu Youhong, 55, has spent more than 30 years repairing (repair) skywell homes in Wuyuan of Jiangxi Province. One of the skywell homes repaired by Yu is in a small village. The 300-year-old house was bought by Edward Gawne, a man from the UK, and his Chinese wife in 2015. ___9___ The couple turned the three-floor house into a 14-room hotel with the help of Yu. They kept the spaces around the skywells as they were before. They are open and with natural airflow. Gawne says that even without air-conditioners, people can rest around the skywell areas comfortably (comfortable) in summer.Skywells will be more and more popular among younger generations. They match young people's ideas about environmental protection. In short, skywells will be important again in our lives.

Bullying is a serious problem for many teenagers. It can happen at any stage of 1youth(young), and it often begins in a very small way. Some students ~~was~~were bullied (bully) at school and feel ashamed. They go through pain and become stressed. A are stranger or even a classmate may say unkind words. This can get them down and make them be in low spirits. They may put up with it because they don't know how to stand up for themselves (they). Adults often tell them to communicate with teachers. However, many teenagers find it difficult. They need patience (patient) and courage. They may waste time on mobile phones and regret it later. Some even hate going to school. Under stress, they may make silly decisions (decide) and risk losing their focus. Their temper may become uglier (ugly) than before, and they may argue with parents about small things. Recently, this problem has drawn(draw) more attention.

Take Tom, a fifteen-year-old teenager, as an example. He had trouble online. At first, he felt shame and kept silent. He stayed up late and used his mobile phone to escape. His exam results dropped, and he was often in low spirits. He even thought it was normal to suffer alone. But one day, his parents noticed his pain and started a dialogue with him. They encouraged him to cut back on screen time and go to bed at bedtime. Tom finally took action to change.

How to deal with the problem?

The first step is to tell (tell) someone you trust. A good dialogue can make a big difference. Schools should hold activities to help students. If a victim is brave, he or she will probably(probable) become more focused (focus) on study. Don't let a bully destroy your life. Remember: you are not alone. Stand up for yourself and ask for help. Pain can make you stronger, but only if you face it. be focused on 专注于
