It's normal to feel nervous before a test. But sometimes, this nervous feeling can become very strong. You might feel sick, get a headache, or feel very scared or sad. This is called test anxiety (忧虑). (26) _____

Dealing with test anxiety is important — it's even been found that students with greater test anxiety get lower grades than those who have less anxiety. Researchers in Turkey wanted to see if there was a simple way to help students with this feeling. They were under a lot of pressure to do well in the exam to get into the best high schools, which would then help them get into top universities.

For the study, 162 eighth-grade students in two different middle schools were introduced to a breathing exercise program three months before the exam. (27) _____ Twice a week over eight weeks, the students were led through a 15- to 20-minute program of breathing exercises, which they did before school. The program included things like using the diaphragm (隔膜) to take deep breaths or doing the "lion's breath" from yoga. (28) _____

Before and after the program, the students completed a test that scored their levels of anxiety. (29) _____ This shows that breathing exercises at school can help students feel less nervous before big tests. It's simple and doesn't cost much.

So, if you have a test coming up and you feel worried, take a deep breath — it's a simple trick that works! (30) _____

A. Researchers found that their anxiety scores dropped by 11%.
B. The program was used to help them relax and control their pressure.
C. Students were also taught ways to stop scary or stressful thoughts.
D. Give it a try, and you might be surprised by how much it helps!
E. Many students didn't believe breathing exercises would work at first.
F. Test anxiety can surely do harm to a student's performance and health.
